FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE – NOVEMBER 10TH 2021

SKIMS is an international fashion brand providing new solutions for shapewear, loungewear and underwear. Although we pride ourselves in being inclusive and catering for everybody to embrace and enhance bodies of all shapes, colours and backgrounds, today our promise will be re-reviewed within our internal team due to a diversity exclusion and discrimination incident which took place during the hiring process at Regents Street, London in anticipation for our upcoming pop-up event, celebrating the new collection launch.

To date, SKIMS has not been faced with reports on such adverse events of discriminatory behaviour and we are devastated to have caused offense on a matter which primarily bases our brands values upon. During this time, we are committed to take proactive measures to eliminate any discrimination within our brand for the future by implementing internal changes in our diversity training programmes as well as taking a philanthropic approach for the underrepresented communities of LGBTQ+ to widen their opportunities in the industry. 'We prioritise our focus on the wellbeing and equal opportunities of our employees, customers and partners' says Kim Kardashian, founder and CEO of SKIMS.

Implementing change to workplace

Currently SKIMS is in the process of rearranging the global diversity and inclusion advisory board, looking to offer a new role to an LGBTQ+ consultant, "we need to re-evaluate our promise to serve 'everybody', and this can be best achieved with internal changes in the company" says Emma Grede, founding partner.

The voices of our customers mean so much to us and twitter has spoken, collectively SKIMS has decided our influencer outreach would benefit from re-training our brand image. We will also be investigating the possibilities for altering the hiring processes across the board globally.

SKIMS will be announcing a two-year programme dedicated to the LGBTQ+ and the underrepresented community to further skills and widen opportunities within the creative industry. We will pledge £500,000 between 100 individuals globally where SKIMS is stocked. Applicants will be able to apply with a creative portfolio to receive support and guidance from our very own designers, journalists and PR team and receive insightful industry talks with our CEO herself, Kim Kardashian and Co-Founders. The result of this program could potentially lead to direct permanent job opportunities at SKIMS after the project.

Thus far we don't have every detail to this pledge nailed down however we are working with Katherine Marian who will be posting our updates on Instagram and Twitter and our website to alert our audience of our improvements.

We hope you stay continue our journey with SKIMS.
